

Niger's resource paradox: what should make the country rich has made it a target for predators

Monday 28 August 2023, by EZENWA Olumba E., OPALEKE Francis (Date first published: 25 August 2023).

A geopolitical struggle for valuable resources such as uranium is behind the wrangling over Niger.

Contents

- Western exploitation
- African resources, western

A month after the coup in Niger that toppled the democratically elected civilian government of Mohamed Bazoum, the country's neighbours are still debating the possibility of military intervention.

The Economic Community of West African States (Ecowas) – a coalition of west African countries, which includes Niger – has said it intends to send in a taskforce to topple the military junta led by General Abdourahamane Tchiani, which ousted Bazoum on July 26.

But the plan to intervene is not without controversy. Niger, a landlocked nation, shares borders with Mali, Algeria, Libya, Chad, Benin and Burkina Faso. These countries have expressed solidarity with the military junta and have committed to oppose any potential Ecowas intervention.

France, which occupied Niger from 1890 until independence in 1960, has also considered intervention – it has a small contingent of troops in the country ostensibly to combat jihadi insurgency in the Sahel region – which the junta has given them notice to withdraw. Algeria has also denied France permission to fly over the country.

For now, the situation remains fluid and uncertain. But beneath the surface of daily news headlines is an intricate web of geopolitical competition and strategic agendas that have profound consequences for the Nigerien people.

The recent coup underscores a geopolitical rivalry deeply rooted in colonial and neo-colonial legacies and intensified by some western nations' drive for the control of Niger's resources.

Although Niger grapples with extreme poverty, leading to widespread malnutrition and hunger among its citizens, it is the world's seventh-biggest producer of uranium. This juxtaposition of mineral wealth and societal poverty underscores the irony of a nation abundant in resources yet plagued by profound economic hardships.

First discovered in 1957 at Azelik by a French colonial expedition looking for copper deposits, Uranium now ranks as Niger's second-largest export in monetary value – surpassed only by gold.

The country is a principal supplier of uranium to the European Union \(EU\) and contributes between 15% and 17% of the uranium fuelling France's electricity generation.

Meanwhile, the country struggles to produce its own electricity because Nigeria recently terminated its power supply to the nation as a sanction against the military junta, leaving much of the country in darkness.

Western exploitation

Given its abundant natural resources, it seems counterintuitive for Niger to rank among the world's poorest nations. Yet its economic and political struggles have deep roots in historical foreign interventions, exploitation and resource extraction. This situation has, for decades, been further compounded by misguided and ineffective leadership, often conniving in exploitation by foreign interests.

While some Ecowas members oppose the coup in Niger and have threatened military intervention against the coup leaders, some western countries are manoeuvring to uphold their interests. The Nigerian senate opposes military intervention, with one of its members alleging that Ecowas would merely be doing France and America's bidding. Senator Orji Uzor Kalu suggested that if there is to be military action, it should be carried out by French and US troops.

Colonial powers and other major geopolitical actors have profoundly influenced Niger's contemporary situation. France, referred to by the New York Times recently as the "Former Coloniser that Stayed", has already warned that any attack on its interests in Niger will be met with retaliation. Meanwhile the reported presence of Wagner Group mercenaries in the country, after a request from the coup leaders, is a proxy for Russian interests in Niger.

But following the reported death of Wagner Group boss, Yevgeny Progozhin, after his private jet is understood to have crashed on a trip from St Petersburg to Moscow on August 23, the status of the Wagner Group activities in Niger – and Africa generally – is uncertain. However, their operations may come under the direct control of Russia's military.

African resources, western interests

Another important resource issue threatened by instability in Niger is the trans-Saharan gas pipeline \(TSGP\), designed to transport natural gas from Nigeria through Niger and on to Algeria and then to Europe. One of the drivers of this project in the past two years has been the European need to wean itself off Russian gas supplies in light of the war in Ukraine.

Yet again, western resource needs are dictating events in supposedly independent and sovereign African countries.

The dominant narrative in west Africa frequently presents foreign interventions as benevolent efforts to stabilise the Sahel region, in particular, against the threat of jihadi insurgency. Yet a deeper examination uncovers a more intricate reality. As western powers strive to shape political dynamics in Niger – driven not just by a desire for stability but also to preserve their dominance and control over resource allocation – they portray Niger, and by extension, Africa, as mere markets within the global economy. This ignores the potential humanitarian consequences of such interventions for the people of Niger and west Africa in general.

As Niger faces political instability and possible violent conflict, there's a pressing need to critically evaluate the motives and repercussions of foreign intervention.

Beyond the veneer of the quest for democracy and stability, the various players' deeper strategic intentions must be scrutinised. This is the key to understanding the multifaceted dynamics in the Sahel region and their broader global implications.

Francis Okpaleke, PhD Candidate, Politics and International Security, University of Waikato et Olumba E. Ezenwa, Doctoral Research Fellow, Conflict, Violence, & Terrorism Research Centre, Royal Holloway University of London

<http://theconversation.com/republishing-guidelines> —>

---

P.S.

- The Conversation. Publié: 25 août 2023, 13:17 CEST.

This article is republished from The Conversation under a Creative Commons license. Read the original article.

- Francis Okpaleke, University of Waikato et Olumba E. Ezenwa, Royal Holloway University of London

Francis Okpaleke. PhD Candidate, Politics and International Security, University of Waikato. I obtained my Bachelors degree in Political Science (First Class Hons) from the University of Nigeria. I subsequently obtained my Masters Degree (Terrorism, Intelligence and Security Studies) at the University of Salford in the United Kingdom and I am currently a PhD Candidate (International Relations and Security Studies), University of Waikato. I have been a Sessional Assistant at the University of Waikato (taking modules in International Relations and International Security). I also functioned in this capacity at the University of Salford in the UK. After my Msc, I was an Assistant Lecturer of International Relations at the Federal University Lafia briefly for two years. Prior to this, I was a Sessional Assistant at the University of Calabar and University of Nigeria respectively.

Ezenwa Olumba is a scholar who researches and writes about how violence and culture influence people's emotions, (im)mobility aspirations, and collective behaviour. He is a doctoral research fellow at the Conflict, Violence, and Terrorism Research Centre at Royal Holloway, University of London, and a lecturer at the School of Applied Social Sciences, University of Bedfordshire. He has published scholarly research papers in various peer-reviewed journals, including Culture & Psychology, Third World Quarterly, Small Wars & Insurgencies, Terrorism and Political Violence, and African Security Review. His seminal work on cognitive immobility, which Culture & Psychology published, is a cutting-edge knowledge contribution to psychology, migration, and social policy. Feel free to email him your stories, thoughts, re-experiences, and ideas on cognitive immobility: ezeolumba@outlook.com

- The Conversation is a nonprofit news organization dedicated to helping academic experts share ideas with the public. We can give away our articles thanks to the help of foundations, universities and readers like you. Donate Now to support research-based journalism